Second Playtest – Blood Pact

Second Playable Overview

For our second playtest, we made few changes after first playtest and tried the updated version of Blood Pact with larger groups in class. Since the first session, we had simplified the rules, increased the recommended age, removed the story cards, and made the Vampire Hunter card optional.

We also improved the components, creating clearer voting and mission tokens as Trevor printed 3d cards with color coding green for mission success and red for mission failure and back of the cards is black so that everyone can vote anonymously. Thanks to these updates, the game ran much more smoothly. Using the finished components like cards and board made everything feel polished and engaging. Instead of going through all the rules at the start, we jumped straight into the game, letting players pick up the mechanics as they played.

The game session went great. Players enjoyed the social deduction, accusing each other, and figuring out who was on which team. The bigger groups made the game more fun.

Key Takeaways

- Simple rules helped players to learn the game quickly.
- The voting and mission tokens made the gameplay easy.
- Starting the game without explaining it allowed players to learn by doing.
- The game board and character cards made the game feel finished and polished.
- Playing with larger groups added more excitement and fun.
- The optional Vampire Hunter card added flexibility.

Players Feedback

- Way easier to understand this time.
- The board and tokens look so much better.
- Fun to play in a big group.
- Learning while playing was perfect.
